Ancient Slavonic Chants

In accordance with earliest Christian canons, music performed in the various divine services was to be exclusively vocal. However, musical instruments, particularly the organ, were eventually introduced into Catholic, Protestant and some other churches. Up to the present day, vocal chants have been retained only by the Orthodox Churches. Some of these chants belong partly to Byzantine and partly to Slavic liturgical music. The latter—Bulgarian, Russian, Serbian and Ukrainian—is still sung in Church Slavonic, the oldest recorded Slavic language.

Tanya Christova, director of the choral ensemble heard on this recording, is a graduate of the Bulgarian State Conservatory and she also studied in the U.S.S.R. She spent many years researching ancient Bulgarian chants in the libraries of monasteries as well as the archives of churches throughout Bulgaria. It was decided to have the music writing deciphered and transcribed into present day musical notation so that these chants could be performed. Some of these chants were tape recorded directly by chapel singers and monks and then transcribed on sheet music so that the choir could learn them. Many of these chants sounded quite unusual to those familiar with liturgical music and it took three years of intensive rehearsals before the choir gave its first public performance under the name of “Ivan Koukouzel Angeloglassny” (Ivan Koukouzel the Angel-Voiced) at the Alexander Nevsky Memorial Cathedral in Sofia. The performance was a huge success and the vocal ensemble prepared additional material which is heard on this recording, of one-voiced chants emanating from the famous Rila and Elean chanting schools as well as chants by Ivan Koukouzel himself, the greatest 14th century Bulgarian musician.

The diverse treatment of the one-voiced chants are very interesting from a musical point of view. In some chants the line of the melody is fluent, easy and calm with a background of an uninterrupted underlying tone which sometimes is doubled as an octave. In another series of chants, the melody is more adventuresome covering a diapason of almost two octaves. Some bold modulations can also be heard as well as frequent use of pauses, seconds and fourths, all of which may be found in Bulgarian folk music. This musical approach may be heard in the selections on Bands 7 and 8 and contemporaries of these chants considered them “non-Byzantine, foreign and barbaric” and, bearing in mind the difficulties connected with their performance, called this music “a scourge for the singers.”
