LEAD BELLY  SHOUT ON

This is the third and final volume of the Lead Belly Legacy Series, which makes available on CD all of the Lead Belly performances originally recorded for Folkways Records during the 1940s. All three volumes—Shout On, Where Did You Sleep Last Night, and Bourgeois Blues—contain previously unreleased tracks, extensive notes, bibliographies, and discographies. Completely remastered from the best sources in the Smithsonian Folkways collection, Volume 3 includes the original Shout On LP in its entirety along with 17 additional tracks. A number of the songs include accompaniment by Woody Guthrie and Cisco Houston.

INTRODUCTION

This compilation is the third and final volume of a series which reissues some of best of the many songs Lead Belly recorded for record company owner and radio engineer Moses Asch in New York City during the 1940s. Asch’s small New York studio hosted many visits from Lead Belly, and much of his vast and varied repertoire during this period was recorded there. This recording reissues the Folkways LP Shout On (Folkways 31030) as well as over a dozen other selections taken from different sources. In its entirety this series includes most all of the significant songs he recorded for Asch. Some of the masters Asch recorded were broken or lost in bankrupcy over time, but almost 200 remain in the Moses and Frances Asch Collection, which came to the Smithsonian in 1987. In addition to the “Lead Belly Legacy” series of reissues, it is our intention to be able to use the Smithsonian Folkways internet site (http://www.si.edu/folkways) to continue to supply supplementary information and photos about Lead Belly in the coming years.

Huddie Ledbetter (1888–1949) was one of the most influential folk musicians of the twentieth century. He was a living encyclopedia of songs that he learned and performed in a career that spanned 60 years and cut across racial, class, and geographic boundaries. His own compositions and his arrangements of older material became standards for contemporary folk and rock musicians. Many of his songs, such as “Goodnight Irene” and “Midnight Special,” have become so central to popular consciousness that most Americans are unaware of where they came from.

The world that Lead Belly inhabited was largely African American, rural, and agrarian. Huddie’s family owned land on which they grew cotton, and it was in the fields that he first heard the solo field hollers, such as “Go Down Old Hannah,” which were sung to help pass the time under the hot sun. They worked long hours five and one-half days a week, resting only on Saturday evening and on Sunday. Saturday evening, in fact, provided the Ledbetters with a chance to relax and was the time when the community held “sooky jumps,” the local name for an informal house party that featured music, dancing, and other diversions. At sooky jumps Huddie heard and was drawn to the country string bands performing “Green Corn” for a circle of square dancers. Sometimes an accordion player—often his Uncle Terrell—would show up, providing a different sound, one that also attracted Huddie. But it was the guitar players that appealed to him the most. And by the turn of the century, Huddie had grown proficient enough on his six-string instrument (the trademark twelve-string was acquired just before World War I) that he began to play for his friends, family, and eventually for these Saturday night functions. Huddie also regularly attended Shiloh Baptist Church, located on the Louisiana-Texas border, singing as a member of the congregation and occasional filling in as the Sunday organist. Although he would leave his family and strike out on his own before he was twenty, Huddie spent most of his early adult life in East Texas, and these early experiences helped him to bridge the era of Reconstruction with a post-modern world he would later hold spellbund.

Lead Belly was “discovered” as a musician in the Louisiana State Penitentiary in Angola by collector John Lomax during one of his many recording trips for the Library of Congress. Lomax had come to document the older styles of folk song he reasoned he would find among prisoners he thought isolated from musical and social development. He and his son, Alan, met Lead Belly in the summer of 1933 and found in him a musician of a caliber they could only have dreamed of. He knew hundreds of songs: on one of Lomax’s radio shows, Lead Belly himself numbered them at 500 at least! After his release from prison in August, 1934, Lead Belly traveled with John and Alan Lomax, serving for several months as their driver. Lead Belly added to his repertoire on their joint song-collecting trips, frequently learning songs and adapting them to his own use. The excellent biography of John Lomax by Nolan Porterfield describes the relationship between the two men and is the best source of information about Lomax himself.

Much has been written elsewhere on Lead Belly’s life. We recommend the biography by Wolfe and Lornell listed in the bibliography. There are also several good pages on the World Wide Web with biographical information on Lead Belly. The focus of the following notes is the roughly ten-year period Lead Belly spent in New York City while making recordings for record company owner and audio engineer Moses Asch. Moses Asch was both a record label and a friend to Lead Belly, for he encouraged him to record the songs he wished to. A detailed picture of their relationship can be found in the liner notes to Volume 1 of this series (Smithsonian Folkways 40044).

Lead Belly first came to New York with the Lomaxes but he and John soon parted company, though Huddie and Alan remained close until the singer’s death. New York offered far more varied and substantial musical opportunities than he could find back in Louisiana. He stayed, settling into an apartment with his wife Martha, whom he wed early in 1935. Lead Belly continued to play for any audience that appreciated him—rarely in the "hip" clubs in Harlem, where he seemed old fashioned. He found his most loyal and appreciative audience in New York's left-wing (and largely White) folk song movement in New York, briefly becoming a member of the folk group the Headline Singers. But most of his music is not explicitly political, and Lead Belly did not seem to regard himself as mainly a political singer. He certainly was capable of composing topical songs, as you can hear on this disc. But his recorded output shows a refreshing breadth, and this breadth is the focus of this series.

Lead Belly traveled to California in 1944 in an unsuccessful attempt to become an actor in Hollywood. Almost all of his later years, after W. W. II, were spent in New York, except for a brief stint in Europe, recording sporadically and playing gigs where he could find them. One individual who took great interest in Lead Belly during his later years was the music critic and writer, Frederic Ramsey Jr. Ramsey, who died in 1994, not only documented Lead Belly, but had a wider interest in jazz and Black music in general. Along with Charles Edward Smith, he wrote Jazzmen (1939), the first book about jazz written and published in the United States. In the early and mid-1950s he recorded a large body of Black American folk music in the South, which resulted in an multi-volume set of records that were issued on Folkways. He also wrote Been Here and Gone, a book about African American Southern music and culture that has never been out of print since it was first published in 1960.

Ramsey's most famous recordings of Lead Belly were made in late 1948, in the fall of the year before he died. It was Ramsey's goal to record all of Lead Belly's repertoire over a number of sessions using his brand new open reel tape recorder (he was only able to arrange a few sessions). These resulted in the famous multi-volume Lead Belly's Last Sessions recordings (Smithsonian Folkways 40068). Also in October 1948, Ramsey used his new machine to record radio transcriptions of Lead Belly. These he supplied to Asch, who used them for his Shout On album. In 1992 all of Ramsey's recordings were donated to the Smithsonian Institution by his daughter Alidad Porter. His personal papers went to the Institute of Jazz Studies at Rutgers University.

Lead Belly found it increasingly difficult to play during 1947, and eventually learned that he had contracted Lou Gehrig's Disease. This insidious and slowly debilitating disease that attacks the muscular systems quickly forced Huddie to use a cane when he walked and, at the end of his life, a wheelchair. It is fortunate that Ramsey was able to make the recordings he did, for by the summer of 1949, Lead Belly was all but incapacitated by his illness. He passed away on December 6, 1949, in Bellevue Hospital in New York.

Partly due to the efforts of the Weavers and others, Lead Belly's music has become well known in the years since his death. Ironically, the Weavers' version of "Good Night Irene" became an "out-of-left field" hit a mere six months after his death. Lead Belly during his life wrote, collected, and reshaped scores of blues; sacred songs, dance tunes, topical selections, and work songs. He left his own indelible stamp on many of them, and to this day you can still hear Lead Belly echoing through the work of artists as diverse as Pete Seeger and Kurt Cobain. During Nirvana's final tours, Cobain often played their version of Huddie's "Black Gal" (aka "Where Did You Stay Last Night") along with the hits their fans expected to hear.

The song annotations include information on the provenance of the recording, Lead Belly's introductions, and suggestions as to sources for additional information. We have attempted to provide information on the source and date of the recording where it is known. Many of Asch's acetates have no date or other information on the disc. Moshe Asch also frequently had multiple takes of the songs in his collection. The quotes in bold come from Lead Belly himself from various recordings in the Asch collection. Lead Belly often started his songs with an introduction, and these quotes come from song introductions both in the studio and on radio.

To the extent possible we also list other releases of the song by Asch as well as printed sources of the music for the benefit of the reader. The list of other releases often includes a number of different takes of the same song and are provided for the sake of comparison. Often these takes were recorded years apart. A discography at the rear of the booklet lists other suggested releases of Lead Belly's music both by Asch and other companies. The music sources are referenced to the bibliography at the end of the notes.
1 Shout On (arr. by Huddie Ledbetter)
Alternative title: Honey, I'm Down and Out
Lead Belly, vocal and guitar (recorded October 1948; from Folkways 31030)

"Shout On" is a blues made up of a combination of verses taken from other blues songs. In fact, one of the lines found on this song, "I'm broke and ain't got a dime," is often encountered in folk blues, and its earliest instance on disc can be traced to Blind Lemon Jefferson's "One Dime Blues," recorded for Paramount Records (12578) in 1927. Another of the verses is also heard on one of Lead Belly's songs, "Whoa Back Buck," which is usually classified as a work song.

(Folkways 31030)

2 Little Children's Blues
(by Huddie Ledbetter) Alternative titles: Children's Blues; Mother's Blues Lead Belly, vocal and (bottleneck) guitar (recorded April 25, 1944; from Folkways 2488/Smithsonian Folkways 40010; matrix 167; Smithsonian acetate 1406; 10' shellac disc; copyright Folkways Music)

These blues, the little children made up about somebody going away. And that's sad. And that gives you the blues.

3 Governor Pat Neff (by Huddie Ledbetter)
Alternative titles: Going Back Home to Mary; Sweet Mary; If I Had You Governor
Lead Belly, vocal and guitar (recorded October 1948; from Folkways 31030; copyright Folkways Music)

Pat Neff, a Waco, Texas, businessman and politician, was the governor of Texas from 1920 through 1924. As a self-described "reformer," Neff sometimes visited the notorious Texas prisons and encountered Huddie Ledbetter, who was incarcerated in Sugarland (near Houston). Lead Belly was chosen by the warden to perform for Gov. Neff, who was quite taken by Huddie's talent. Huddie sang and "clowned" with great fervor. On a subsequent visit, Neff asked again for Lead Belly. It was during this second visit that Neff told Huddie that he would grant him a pardon. His predecessor, "Big Jim" Ferguson, was legendary for granting pardons by the hundreds, and part of Neff's reform platform was stopping this practice. And this is one campaign promise that he largely adhered to; during his tenure Neff pardoned only five prisoners, including Huddie Ledbetter on his final day in office! This song, which Lead Belly first recorded for the Library of Congress shortly after his release from a subsequent term in Angola, uses a melody similar to another of Huddie's songs, "Blind Lemon."

(Folkways 2942; 31030; Smithsonian Folkways 40068) For music and information about the song see Lomax 1959 and Wolfe 1992.

4 Ain't Going Down to the Well No More (by Huddie Ledbetter) Lead Belly, vocal (recorded October 1948; from Folkways 31030; copyright Folkways Music)

Once more drawing upon a childhood growing up in the cotton country of East Texas, Lead Belly performs a field holler that was part of his early musical landscape. These types of solo pieces were often sung by Black workers (men, women, and children) as they toiled in the fields. As sung by Huddie during his childhood, it could have been to accompany his work hoeing, picking, or simply walking to or from the field. This type of difficult physical labor kept Huddie in good shape and helped him to earn his nickname (Lead Belly) while he was in imprisoned in Sugarland between 1920 and early 1925.

(Folkways 2941; 31030; Smithsonian Folkways 40068) For music and information about the song see Lomax 1959 and Wolfe 1992.

5 Go Down, Old Hannah (arr. by Huddie Ledbetter) Lead Belly, vocal and guitar (recorded October 1948; from Folkways 31030; copyright Folkways Music)

They called the sun Old Hannah because it was hot, and they just give it a name. That's what the boys called it when I was down in prison. I didn't hear it before I went down there. The boys were talking about Old Hannah. I kept looking and I didn't see no Hannah, but they looked up and said, "That's the sun."

This is one of the best-known work songs in Texas. On his visits to Texas prisons in search of folk songs, John Lomax (often accompanied by his son Alan) recorded many versions to document this type of song he felt would soon be lost. They also recorded versions from prisoners Augustus “Track Horse” Haggerty in Huntsville, James “Iron Head” Baker in Dallas, and Mose “Clear Rock” Platt in Taylor. As a native Texan, Lomax might have remembered the song from his youth in the 1880s, when he became interested in African American music and culture.

ways 40068) For music and information about the song see Ash 1962, Lomax 1941, Lomax

6 Come and Sit Down Beside Me Lead Belly, vocal and guitar (recorded October 1948; from Folkways 31030)
As Huddie’s audience grew in the mid- to late 1930s, his own repertoire expanded. Not forsaking his store of blues, spirituals, work songs, and dance tunes, Huddie simply added new material, most notably original topical songs about events like the Hindenburg distaster and some of the day’s more popular songs.
One of his favorites from his period was “That Silver Haired Daddy of Mine,” a sentimental song popularized by Gene Autry earlier in the decade. “Come and Sit Down Beside Me” fits into Lead Belly’s revamped musical paradigm.
He performed the song more often for his children’s programs than for adults.

7 How Long, How Long (by Leroy Carr)
Alternative title: How Long Blues Lead Belly, vocal and guitar; Sonny Terry, vocal and harmonica (recorded August 1943; from Asch 343-1; matrix SC-260; Smithsonian acetate 1615, 10" shellac disc) First recorded in 1928 by Leroy Carr on vocal and piano with Scrapper Blackwell’s guitar accompaniment, the song became so popular that after its release by Vocalion, it was continually re-issued in the middle 1930s on various d’mestore” labels such as Banner, Oriole, and Perfect. Carr’s wistful, lonely lament caused a sensation among African American record buyers, spawning many imitations and “covers” by Tampa Red, Kokomo Arnold, and Big Joe Turner, among others. “How Long” has become a blues standard in the repertoire of today’s blues artists even though it doesn’t follow the 12-bar blues format.
(Asch 343) For more information about this song see Wolfe 1992.

8 Old Man (arr. by Huddie Ledbetter)
Alternative title: Old Man Can Your Dog Catch a Rabbit?; Lead Belly, vocal and guitar (from Folkways 7027)
Here come that Big Bella Lee sailing down the Mississippi. You got to load it before you ride and sail. And the boys gonna load it this-a-way.
Part of the African American well-spring of music from the Reconstruction era, this song comes from roustabouts who unloaded boats along great and small rivers. Such men, not all of them Black, worked as laborers until well into the mid-20th century. These songs began to fall out of the repertoire of dock workers as mechanization took over much of this back-braking work.
(Folkways 7027) For music and information about the song see Ash 1962, Lomax 1959.

9 John Henry
Lead Belly, vocal and guitar; Brownie McGhee, guitar; Sonny Terry, harmonica (recorded October 1948; from Folkways 31030)
Now “John Henry” is made up by the hard-working-man folks. Don’t forget it. Anytime you hear anybody singing “John Henry” it’s a dance tune if they play it right. John Henry come from Newport News. Mr. Lomax and myself we drove all around the spot John Henry was born at. That’s the reason they say, “that C&O road”; that runs from Newport News to Cincinnati, Ohio. John Henry’s the man drove steel, he drove spikes around all the steel was laid from Newport News to Cincinnati. Now that’s true.... Now this is “John Henry” and it’s a dance tune and we dance to it down home, and I’m gonna play it for you. (from interview with Frederic Ramsey Jr., Smithsonian Folkways 40068)
This is probably the most famous and most frequently performed American folk song. As of this writing there were over 180 different renditions of the song in the Smithsonian folklore archive. The versions recorded by the Library of Congress in their list of pre-1940 recordings are on for three pages. The song deals with the legendary John Henry and the digging of the Big Bend tunnel in West Virginia. Lead Belly’s version of the song is the one most commonly heard, but many different tellings of the tale exist. Some tell the tale from John Henry’s point of view, some from his wife Polly Ann’s.
Some examples of songs in the John Henry tradition are “The Death of John Henry” by Uncle Dave Macon (1870–1952); “New John Henry Blues” by Bill Monroe (1911-1996);
and “Spikedriver Blues” by Mississippi John Hurt (1893–1966). Folk singer Josh White devoted an entire side of one of his LPs to versions of the song. On Lead Belly’s version he is accompanied by Sonny Terry (Saunders Terrell, 1911–1986). Terry was used by Asch on many of the recordings he made in the early 1940s.

10 Jean Harlow (by Huddie Ledbetter)

Lead Belly, vocal and guitar (recorded May 1944; from Folkways 2488/Smithsonian Folkways 40010; copyright Folkways Music)

According to Moses Asch, Lead Belly told him that one night while in prison his thoughts turned to women, and he composed this song. Since guitars were forbidden he played it on the concertina (Asch 1962, pg. 87). This version, however, is with the 12-string. Jean Harlow (1911-1937) was one of the first Hollywood sex symbols in the 1920s and 1930s. She made 21 films between 1928 and 1937, acting along with such stars as Clark Gable. She died at age 26 from kidney failure. This is Lead Belly’s song about Harlow’s death and is one of many topical songs he composed or performed about important figures (such as the Scottsboro Boys) or historical events (such as the sinking of the Titanic).

(Folkways 2488; 31006; Smithsonian Folkways 40010) For music and information about the song see Asch 1962, Lomax 1959, Sing Out 15/6 and Wolfe 1992.

11 Birmingham Jail

(arr. by Huddie Ledbetter); Alternative title: Down in the Valley; Lead Belly, vocal and guitar (recorded October 1948; from Folkways 31030; copyright Folkways Music)

This song is perhaps better known as “Down in the Valley,” a song that circulated widely during the early part of the 20th century. Performed in 3/4 time, this melody is well known across the United States. This variant by Huddie is almost certainly derived from a popular 1927 78 rpm record on Columbia (15212) recorded by Darby and Tartin. This “hillbillly” duo was based in the cotton mill area along the North and South Carolina border and recorded a wide selection of bluesy songs, sentimental ballads, and topical songs during the late 1920s.

(Folkways 2691; 2942; 31030; Smithsonian Folkways 40068) For music and information about the song see Lomax 1959 and Wolfe 1992.

12 Don’t Sleep Too Long (by Huddie Ledbetter); Alternative title: When I Lay Down to Sleep; Lead Belly, vocal and guitar (recorded ca.1941; no matrix; Smithsonian acetate 376; 16” glass disc; copyright Folkways Music)

This number is going to be dedicated to my little wife, which is half my life. My guitar is called kill-a-car, and that’s the other half. An’ when you sleep, don’t sleep too long, ‘cause you can’t tell, what’s going on. You wake up once in a while, ‘cause your house might catch on fire, and you get burned up. So just listen to these boys. I made this when they tore down the 6th Avenue El.

This song was a favorite piece for Lead Belly to use on his radio programs. It has been published in the Lead Belly Song Book but has never been previously released commercially. For music and information about the song see Asch 1962.

13 It Was Early One Morning (by Huddie Ledbetter); Alternative title: Jail House Bound; Lead Belly, vocal and guitar (recorded October 1948; from Folkways 31030)

Most songs about incarceration bemoan separation from friends and family, but Huddie’s emphasizes the legal trouble itself. As early as the 1920s African American musicians as diverse as Bessie Smith, Robert Wilkins, Memphis Minnie, Ora Brown, and Sam Collins were utilizing this basic theme, using titles like “Jail House Blues,” “Jailhouse Moan,” and “Jailhouse Trouble Blues.”

(Folkways 31030)

The next three selections are related to the involvement of the United States in World War II. These topical songs are predictably patriotic in tone. For more information about the nature and scope of Asch-related artists’ role in composing and singing songs about World War II, please refer to That’s Why We’re Marching; World War II and the American Folk Song Movement. (SF 40021).

14 Uncle Sam Says (Bottle Up and Go) (by Huddie Ledbetter); Lead Belly, vocal and guitar (recorded January 17, 1942; unreleased; no matrix; Smithsonian acetate...
317; 12" glass disc).

This is one I made up about when they were drafting the men. Uncle Sam say he travel east, and when he travel the west, Uncle Sam says he believes that he knows the best.

For information on the song "Bottle Up and Go" see Volume 1 of this series. Lead Belly's performance is interesting, unique, and noteworthy in his creative adaptation of this salacious blues standard to a World War II motif. In this instance Uncle Sam/United States (via Huddie) urges the listener to "Bottle Up and Go to War," an appropriate sentiment for a song recorded during the month after the Japanese bombed Pearl Harbor! Lead Belly’s song should not be confused with Josh White’s song also called "Uncle Sam Says," recorded about the same time.

16 National Defense Blues
(by Huddie Ledbetter)

Alternative title: Defense Blues
Lead Belly, vocal and guitar; Sonny Terry, harmonica; Brownie McGhee, guitar; Willie "The Lion" Smith, piano; George "Pops" Foster, bass (recorded circa 1946; from Smithsonian Folkways 40021; matrix D386; Smithsonian acetate 292; 10" shellac disc, copyright Folkways Music)

When I was out in California the boys told me, "Ledbetter, the women are working on that defense and they's making lots of money—just quitting their husbands." So a lot of the boys knowed I come from World War I (Logsdon 1995). It is not clear whether Huddie was aware of this earlier piece, whether he heard contemporary versions by Gene Autry or Jimmy Wakely, or heard it from some other source. This was recorded nearly five months after the entry of the United States into World War II, when one of the popular slogans of the day was "Do Your Part." Huddie seems caught up in the patriotic fervor that swept the country. It is also a fine example of Lead Belly's ability to write topical songs with great popular appeal.

(Smithsonian Folkways 40021)

Louisiana. I met a man out there who says, "Ledbetter, you know one thing, I come out here with my wife, and you know she done quit me." I say, "Well." He says, "Well look, every pay day come her check's as big as mine." I say, "Well." He says, "Well look, every Saturday she's putting her money in the bank." I say, "What then?" He says, "Well look, can't you make up a song," I say, "Well, I don't know. I'll think it over." And she was working on the defense, so here goes.

World War II was a great equalizer in America. It helped integrate the armed services and brought women into the industrial work force in great numbers. Huddie knew this situation firsthand, having spent a brief period working in a defense plant, and his song explicitly comments on it.

18 Ham and Eggs
Alternative titles: I’ve Got to Roll; Make It on the Side of the Road
Lead Belly, vocal and guitar; Woody Guthrie, vocal and guitar; Cisco Houston, vocal and guitar (recorded October 1946; from Folkways 31046/Disk 6043; matrix D670)
That’s the way the hammer falls when they sing about Ham and Eggs.

This ensemble performance comes from one of the sessions that Moses Asch put together in the studio, but which truly reflected the “live” performances were the backbone of Huddie’s career during the 1940s. Huddie often worked as a solo artist but sometimes appeared with Woody Guthrie and others. This work song, most often sung a capella, has been arranged for a small group with a guitar. Alan Lomax and his sister Bess Lomax Hawes recorded the song as “Make It on the Side of the Road” in 1937 for the Library of Congress (AFS 1617B2/3). Another version was recorded by Josh White, who called it “I’ve Got to Roll.” (Disc 6043; Folkways 31046) For music and information about the song see Asch 1962, Lomax 1959, Lomax 1960, Silber 1973, and Wolfe 1992.

19 Midnight Special
Lead Belly, vocal and guitar; Woody Guthrie, vocal and mandolin; Cisco Houston, vocal and guitar (recorded October 1946; from Disc 6043/Folkways 31046; matrix D674)
According to Alan Lomax, this song was created in Sugarland Prison in Texas and referred to a railroad train which ran by the prison at night. The “Midnight Special” became a symbol for freedom and was especially touching for Sugarland prisoners because the same train tracks carried most people from Houston who came for weekend visits. In this regard the train represented both a promise of freedom and a more tangible link to people “from the outside.” (Lomax interviewed during the film "Folkways: A Vision Shared")

Clearly derived from traditional sources, versions of this song first appeared on records as early as 1925 (by Sodarisa Miller for Paramount) and up through the middle 1930s, long before any of these artists would have encountered Huddie Ledbetter or his recordings of the song. The Library of Congress recorded prisoners in Alabama, Mississippi, and Louisiana during the 1930s. Ironically, one of these versions was by a Central State Farm—the official name for the prison at Sugarland, Texas—prisoner named Ernest Williams, who recorded it some two weeks before the Lomaxes’ initial session with Lead Belly. Despite the earlier dissemination of this song, Lead Belly’s arrangement of the song became the standard one for many of the folk groups of the 1960s and for the rock group Creedence Clearwater Revival in the early 1970s. (Disc 6043; Folkways 2941; 2942; 31046; Smithsonian Folkways 40001; 40045; 40068; Verve/Folkways 3019) For music and more information about the song see Asch 1962, Asch 1965, Botkin 1944, Hille 1948, Lomax 1940, Lomax 1947a, Lomax 1947b, Lomax 1960, Sundburg 1927, Seeger 1961, Silber 1973 and Wolfe 1992.

20 Grey Goose
Lead Belly, vocal and guitar; Woody Guthrie and Cisco Houston, vocals (recorded October 1946; from Disc 6044; matrix D673; acetate 298; 10” shellac disc)
Now this is a preacher. Down in my home, Baptist people go to church on a Sunday. Well, they had a preacher who was supposed to be a reverend. Well, instead of the preacher going to church that Sunday, he went out and tried to kill a grey goose, and the grey goose is still laughing at him. When the sisters found out the preacher had tried to kill him a grey goose, they said “Lord, Lord, Lord.” That’s where that “Lord, Lord, Lord” come in.
Moses Asch recorded this song at various times with different personnel. In the 1940s, Asch released what he called his Folksay series. On these recordings he would record whatever group of musicians happened to be in the studio that day in loose arrangements of folk songs. One such group was Lead Belly, Woody Guthrie, and Cisco Houston, who performed this song. "Grey Goose" was also a song known to convicts. Versions of this song were recorded by the Lomaxes in three separate prisons in Texas. They recorded an inmate named James "Iron Head" Baker in Sugarland (1933), Augustus "Track Horse" Haggerty in Huntsville (1934), and Washington "Lightnin" in the Bastrop County State Farm (1933).

(Disc 6044; Folkways 4, 804, 2004; 2941; 7020; 31019; Smithsonian Folkways 40001, 40044, 4006871) For music and information about the song see Asch 1962; Asch 1965; Botkin 1944; Lomax 1947B; Lomax 1959; Silber 1973; Sing Out 3/11 (1953); and Wolfe 1992.

21 Yellow Gal (arr. by Huddie Ledbetter)
Alternative titles: "Yeller Gal," "Yeller Gal" Lead Belly, vocal and guitar; Woody Guthrie, vocal and mandolin; Cisco Houston, vocal (recorded October 1946; from Disc 6044; matrix D671; acetate 296; 10" shellac disc)

This is Yellow Gal...it's a famous gal. And the boys would always get to dancing and sukey jumpin' around, just singing about Yellow Gal.

(Disc 660 {as part of a medley}; 6044; Folkways 4, 804, 2004, 2942, 31019; Smithsonian Folkways 40044,4006871; and Verve/ Folkways 3019) For music and information about the song see Asch 1962; Lomax 1959.

22 Green Corn (arr. by Huddie Ledbetter)
Lead Belly, vocal and guitar; Woody Guthrie, vocal and mandolin; Cisco Houston, vocal and guitar (recorded October 1946; from Folkways 2004; matrix D674; acetate)

Lead Belly recorded this song several times for Asch, sometimes alone and sometimes with the help of Woody Guthrie and Cisco Houston. According to Charles Wolfe and Kip Lornell, Lead Belly learned this song from two of his neighbors in Louisiana as a child. It was a square dance tune most often played on the fiddle. "Green Corn" refers to brand new moonshine whiskey (Wolfe 1992).

(Disc 660 {as part of a medley}; Folkways 4, 804, 2004; Smithsonian Folkways 40044) For music and information about the song see Asch 1962; Lomax 1959; Silber 1973; Sing Out 6/4 (1956); and Wolfe 1992.

The following seven selections are united in their appeal to children. In the early 1940s, Lead Belly recorded a 78 rpm record set that was perhaps the first "album" devoted to music for kids. That Lead Belly had such a wide range of songs for children did not surprise those who knew him well. Pete Seeger once remarked that "he was wonderful with children. He'd get them singing with him, clapping their hands andswaying their bodies." (from the notes to Folkways album 31022)

23 The Parting Song (arranged by Ledbetter)
Lead Belly, vocal and guitar (recorded October 1948; from Folkways 31030 or recorded May 1941; matrix SC35; Smithsonian acetate 1433; 10" shellac disc)

Unlike many of the songs in Huddie's repertoire, this is a distant relative of one from the world of popular music. It is based on the well-worn aphorism, "When you smile, the whole world smiles with you." The same phrase inspired the pop song "When You're Smiling the Whole World Smiles with You," which was recorded by many artists including Frank Sinatra and Judy Garland.

24 Rooster Crows at Midnight (arr. by Huddie Ledbetter)
Alternative titles: Christmas Times A-Coming; Christmas Song; Chicken Crowing for Midnight; Almost Day; Lead Belly, vocal and guitar (recorded; from Folkways 31046; copyright Folkways Music)

This is a children's play song on a Christmas night when they're looking for the Santa Claus to come. When they're looking for the Santa Claus to come, well you know children stay up all day and all night and at midnight they get out in the yard and play "Moonshine Tonight" and the chickens be crowing for midnight and the children gonna make a ring and play and here's what they sing while they play, waiting for the Santa Claus to come.

Huddie was legendary for his interest in children. A father himself, Lead Belly's New York City apartment occasionally hosted impromptu concerts for children from his building. Huddie often performed programs that were specially designed for children, who seemed fascinated with his animated performances and his singular stage presence. No doubt the Christmas motif and the presence of barnyard animals in this song helps to account for its popularity among children.

(Asch SC-34; Folkways 7533; 31046; Smithsonian Folkways 40044) For music and information about the song see Asch 1962; Lomax 1959.
25 Skip to My Lou
Lead Belly, vocal and guitar (recorded October 1948; from Folkways 31030)

When you say "Skip to My Lou," little children got to skip to their partners. This means little girls got to skip to the little boys and then they gonna dance around the ring.

This is another of the most popular folk songs in the United States. It is a children's play party song that can still be seen and heard in schools and on playgrounds all over the country. Moreover, "Skip to My Lou" appears frequently both in Anglo and African American traditions.

26 More Yet / Little Boy How Old Are You / Green Grass Growing All Around Lead Belly, vocal and guitar ("More Yet" is by Huddie Ledbetter; recorded April 25, 1944; matrix 168, Smithsonian acetate 1407; 10" shellac disc)

"Green Grass Growing" is perhaps better known under the title "Tree in the Wood." It's a song that appears in numerous 20th-century songbooks, including the Southern-oriented collections of Cecil Sharp, and is probably Anglo-American in origin. In more recent years it has been collected in many languages other than English.

(Ash 331-1)

27 What Are Little Boys Made Of / Polly Wee
Lead Belly, vocal and guitar ("Polly Wee" is by Huddie Ledbetter; recorded April 23, 1944; matrix 684-1; Smithsonian acetate 1408; 10" shellac disc)

This wistful song is atypical of Lead Belly's children's repertoire. It is sung more from the perspective of an adult looking back, rather than that of a child. As such it is unique among Lead Belly's children's songs.

(Ash 333-3; Polly Wee on 40068). For music and information about Polly Wee see Lomax 1959.

28 Ha Ha This A-Way (arr. Ledbetter)
Lead Belly, vocal and guitar (recorded October 1948; from Folkways 31010)

This is a children's play song. Now the children, when they play back in my home, they put one in the ring, and they all go round the ring, and they sing. Now this is gonna be Ha-Ha This a-Way and Ha-Ha That a-Way, and when the boys in the ring or a girl, they say Ha-Ha This a-Way he has to jump that-a-way. We he says Ha-Ha That a-Way he has to jump that-a-way. And the others going round the ring, they gonna sing.

More typical of Huddie's songs for children, this play party song appears to have been one of his favorites. He recorded and performed it on numerous occasions, and it is one of the songs that was (reportedly) most requested by children. This animated version comes from his last session to be released by Moses Ash and was recorded mere months before Lou Gehrig's disease made it all but impossible for Lead Belly to perform.

(Ash 331-3B; Folkways 14, 2014, 31030; Smithsonian Folkways 40044) For music and information about the song see Ash 1962, Lomax 1959; Sing Out 2/8 (1952); and Wolfe 1992.

29 You Can't Lose Me, Cholly (Ledbetter)
Lead Belly, vocal and guitar (recorded October 1948; from Folkways 31030)

"You can't lose-a me Cholly" is about a boy that's going places. An they gonna see things; and the little children is all gonna follow. And he's what they sing.

This is another children's song from late in Huddie's career. It seems figuratively to reflect Huddie's own career. Like the narrator of this song, Huddie always wanted to see things, to expand his horizons beyond the world of the Texas-Louisiana border. He seemed to always look forward to new challenges, relying on his well-grounded talent and experiences.

(Ash SC80; Folkways 4, 804, 2004, 31030; Smithsonian Folkways 40044) For music and information about the song see Ash 1962; Lomax 1959; Lomax 1960; and Wolfe 1992.

30 It Was Soon One Morning (arr. Ledbetter)
Lead Belly, vocal (recorded October 1948; from Folkways 31030)

One of Huddie's blues, this song weaves together a narrative from verses heard on travels and records.

(Folkways 31030)

31 Take This Hammer (arr. Ledbetter)
Lead Belly, vocal and guitar (recorded October 1948; from Folkways 31030)

"Take this hammer. This is the way the hammers fall when they sing. This is a well-known African American work song. Lead Belly's exclamation after each line of the song is timed to help the railroad workers as they are lining the track. The workers, often called gandy dancers, used these songs for three fundamental and simultaneous purposes. These group work songs helped coordinate the tempo of their work, took their mind off the tedious nature of their work, and engendered a higher level of group solidarity.

(Asch 101A; Disc 735; Folkways 4, 804, 2004, 31019, 31030; Smithsonian Folkways 40044) For music and information about the song see Asch 1962; Botkin 1944; Hille 1948; Lomax 1940; Lomax 1947A; Lomax 1947B; Lomax 1959; Silber 1973; and Wolfe 1992.

32 Pick a Bale of Cotton
Lead Belly, vocal and guitar; Brownie McGhee, vocal and guitar; Sonny Terry, harmonica (recorded October 1948; from Folkways 31030)

Now this is when I was around Dallas, Texas, pickin' cotton. I was pickin' a thousand pounds of cotton a day. And the way you get a thousand pounds of cotton a day, you've got to jump around to get it. You can't fool around and pick a thousand pounds of cotton a day.

This song about cotton picking was recorded a number of times by the Lomaxes for the Library of Congress. They recorded versions at prisons in both Sugarland and Huntsville, Texas. Two of the other convicts at Sugarland with Lead Belly were James "Iron Head" Baker and Moses "Clear Rock" Platt, and they also recorded for the Lomaxes. It seems that this is one of the many songs Lead Belly learned while in prison. Apparently, it is physically impossible to pick a bale of cotton in one day, so this song takes on the tone of a brag.

(Folkways 4, 804, 2004, 31019, 31030; Smithsonian Folkways 40044) For music and information about the song see Asch 1962; Lomax 1940; Lomax 1947A; Lomax 1947B; Lomax 1959; Silber 1973; and Wolfe 1992.

ARCHIVIST'S REMARKS

Magnetic tape technology first came into use for audio recording in the late 1940s. Before then, most mastering was done directly on discs. Most of the music in the Lead Belly Legacy project was originally recorded by Moses Asch in the 1940s on several types of disc. Some machines recorded directly onto aluminum discs, while others recorded onto acetate or shellac discs.

Most master discs were recorded at about 78 rpm and consequently could not hold more than four minutes of music. Selections that ran longer often had to be broken up into two parts. Later on, but still before he moved to magnetic tape, Asch used 33 1/3 rpm masters to record longer pieces on disc.

Acetate discs of the type used for recording these tracks consisted of an aluminum or glass base covered with a layer of lacquer. During the war, when many of these discs were recorded, the glass base was used because metal was dedicated to military uses. With the passage of time, lacquer may peel off the base like old paint, so it is important that acetate discs be transferred to a more stable medium as soon as possible. Shellac discs are more stable than acetate and are more like the vinyl discs we are familiar with. They are, however, quite brittle. Here at the Smithsonian we are in the midst of the slow and laborious task of transferring all 5,000 acetates in the collection.

The appearance of magnetic tape marked a revolutionary change in recording because uninterrupted performances could be much longer. Different sections could also be spliced together to create another recording without re-recording an entire performance. Surprisingly, magnetic tape masters from the 1950s are still playable and in good shape as of 1998. However, playing them can cause damage, and we always make copies as they are played, for they may not be as good the next time.

In the case of many recordings, the acetate was either missing, broken, or of not good enough quality to warrant reissue. In that case, we mastered from an early 78 pressing or from magnetic tape copies of the original acetates made in the 1950s and 1960s when the acetate masters were in better condition.

During the 1940s, Moses Asch’s studio was an open house to many of the recording artists in the New York area. Asch’s recording log is a fascinating list of the top jazz and folk music performers of the day, including Lead Belly, Burl Ives, Josh White, Sonny and Brownie, Langston Hughes, James P. Johnson, Mary Lou Williams, Coleman Hawkins, and Pete Seeger, among others. During the war there was an extreme shortage of blank acetates, which kept} Asch from making numerous takes of the same song during a single session. For this reason a recording may have been issued with a mistake in the performance, for it was the best take Asch had.

As we approach the turn of the century, more and more artistic expression is stored on media or in electronic form. These media have a finite lifespan. It is important that we think in terms of preserving them, or there will be nothing left for future generations to appreciate. These acetate discs are already 50 years old and live on borrowed time. It is imperative that these recordings be transferred to a more stable medium. The reissue of much of this material allows both the preservation of these discs and the public exposure of many treasures hidden for years. We hope to continue this work and release many more such collections over the coming years.

ABOUT SMITHSONIAN FOLKWAYS
Folkways Records was founded by Moses Asch and Marian Distler in 1948 to document music, spoken word, instruction, and sounds from around the world. In the ensuing decades, New York City-based Folkways became one of the largest independent record labels in the world, reaching a total of nearly 2,200 albums, which were always kept in print.

The Smithsonian institution acquired Folkways from the Moses Asch estate in 1987 to ensure that the sounds and genius of the artists would be preserved for future generations. All Folkways recordings are available on high-quality audio cassettes, each packed in a special box along with the original LP liner notes.

Smithsonian Folkways Recordings was formed to continue the Folkways tradition of releasing significant recordings with high-quality documentation. It produces new titles, reissues of historic recordings from Folkways and other record labels, and in collaboration with other companies also produces instructional videotapes and recordings to accompany published books and other educational projects.

The Smithsonian Folkways, Folkways, Cook, Paredon, and Dyer-Bennet record labels are administered by the Smithsonian Institution’s Center for Folklife Programs & Cultural Studies. They are one of the means through which the Center supports the work of traditional artists and expresses its commitment to cultural diversity, education, and increased understanding.

You can find Smithsonian Folkways Recordings at your local record store. Smithsonian Folkways, Folkways, Cook, Paredon, and Dyer-Bennet recordings are all available through:
